Director, CRCC

The DePaul Center for Religion, Culture and Community brings DePaul students and faculty as well as the wider community together to explore the requirements of building communities across religious boundaries. The work of the Center engages religious dimensions of pluralism, conflict and peace building in multiple contexts. Our goal is to promote dialogue and connect DePaul's efforts with religious culture with individuals and institutions that are developing new approaches to interreligious cooperation across the U.S. and internationally.

The Name Change: Center for Religion, Culture and Community

As of July 1st, we have changed our name from Center for Interreligious Engagement to Center for Religion, Culture and Community officially.

In May, 2015, we had held a committee meeting regarding the name change and decided to move forward with the new name, Center for Religion, Culture and Community.

Our center is here to help you practically increase your knowledge of religion.

Furthermore, we hope to encourage discussion and create events that are practical for faculty, staff, students, and community members. And, the collaboration will assist all of us to develop new and innovative programs at the center.
